Through his boyhood, during the newspaper selling, the banana-hauling, and the frame manufacturing, he had managed to secure a good public school education. Then he worked in a law office from 8 o'clock in the morning until 5 in the afternoon. From the office he made a dash every day to the afternoon and evening classes in law in the University of Maryland. It was a three-year term and young Wolf made it, having done all his studying late at night and having saved enough money from his earnings to buy all the textbooks prescribed in the course. But they turned down the offer "to treat" and said all they their number who was "up on a larceny charge." From that day on the opportunities came looking for him all the time.

When he made up his mind to run for congress the old Democrats went to his office in a group and patted him on the shoulder, saying: "You're a good boy, Harry, but you're too young. Wait a few years and go to congress later.'
